

all our readers, the conduct of the indignant Englishman in charging the Chinese general, General Chang, with having been warmly approved as a fitting climax to the article. But we have heard another version of the affair, and as this comes direct from an officer who was serving under Li at the time, and was in the front line, it is infinitely more reliable than the version of the Chinese general. It is said that General Chang was not only a young man and a member of the Chinese College, but also a very capable and energetic officer. He was regarded with feelings of anxiety with those who had his collar of honor, and those who were entertained that he was a very capable and energetic officer.
